For the practising lawyer, how is arguing cases before international courts and tribunals different from arguing cases before national courts? Does it depend on whether the lawyer hails from the civil law or common law tradition? Does how the lawyer argue the case depend on the specific international court or tribunal, on whether the lawyer is representing a state or a private party, on the political dimension to the dispute, and so on?

Two of today's most active practising international lawyers will discuss these and other issues raised by arguing cases before the International Court of Justice, the Permanent Court of Arbitration, the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, the European Court of Human Rights, international investment tribunals and other international judicial bodies.
